“ Uncle Mike was my favorite Uncle. He always made me feel special, important, and loved. I was always excited when my dad would say Aunt Lorry and Uncle Mike were coming over (even as an adult when there was a function happening at my dads).

I miss him. Big Hugs to the entire family! Oh, another note from Ellen, she said the Aunt Lorry and Uncle Mike were the first people in my family outside of my immediate family that made her feel welcome and part of the family. Thank you for that.

“ I had written a eulogy for my dad, but I never got a chance to share it at the funeral. It's below and I'm immensely proud to call him my dad.

Love you dad,
Nancy Zable

Matt, Mitch, Mike

Whatever name you called him, everyone knew my father. Some may not even have known him by name, but simply as “the guy at the hardware store”. That's the kind of guy my dad was. Because of his stories, his advice and friendly and happy outlook on everything. Everyone remembered my dad.

Mike was a hard working man. He worked for Illinois Auto Electric for 40 years. When he decided to retire, mom was looking forward to doing some wood working crafts with him and selling them at craft shows. So when he came home the next week from visiting the local Ace Hardware store, and announced to my mom that he was going back to work, she was a little disappointed. But she waited, patiently, for him to retire again. Months turned into years, and mom realized that dad was doing what he loved. And he did it for another 26 years, retiring from that job just last November, at 90 years old.

He took tremendous pride in his work. If you ever came over to the house, he would proudly tell you about how he built the garage or dressers, or refurbished the old cabinets he had into a new computer desk. And he could fix most anything. He would go to work, then come home and work around the house or help someone fix their car or plumbing. He was our MacGyver, fixing anything with some scraps, a rubber band, paper clips and some duct tape. And if he couldn't fix it you could bet that you need to get a new one. If you had an issue with something, he was ready to help you. And I'm not talking about “let's fix it next Tuesday.” I mean “come on over. Let's take a look at it.” Even after my sisters moved out of state, they would call dad with a mechanical issue, and he would try to talk them through its fix over the phone.

He cared. About everything. From his work, to his family, to everyone he knew. And it reflected in everything he did, and it was evident to everyone who knew him. That's why he was so well loved. You knew he genuinely cared. He freely gave advice, whether it be on how to fix your plumbing or your car, how to improve your bowling game, to making your life with your significant other better. He wanted to help make your life better, even if it was just to give you his happy greeting of “Heya guy, how you doing?” and he sincerely hoped that everything in your life was good.

He did it all. And it wasn't just the mechanical stuff either. He was “doctor” and “dentist” to my sisters and me. We would shudder at the thought of having to tell dad that we had a loose tooth or an open scrape, for fear that he would be doing home dentistry, or running after us with the Mercurochrome.

Mom and dad had three girls, but dad never believed that just because we were girls that had to wear dresses and cook and clean. Dad taught us how to throw a baseball and football, how to drive (mom was a little too nervous for that). He even taught us how to fix those cars. Dad never saw limits for us and believed that we could do anything, even if we didn't think we could. It's because of dad that my sisters and I have a hard work ethic and take pride in what we do.

People who met dad were amazed that he was 91. They would ask him what was his secret was for living so long and looking so good. He said always keep moving; don't ever stop moving. And my mom. He always said that coming home to my mom made everything worthwhile.

My dad had always said that he's lived a long good life, and when his time comes, he was ready. But we weren't. We wanted to learn more and hear more stories from him. Maybe that's why he had three names. Because his spirit was way too large to be contained by only one person.

Mike, Matt, Mitch, you were a well loved man. God bless you and we will miss you.

“ Mom came back from Chicago and told me that you were showing all the pretty young nurses this picture of you and Skippy. Probably because Skippy is cute and not because you were a handsome young man with big muscles right? You'll be missed by so many grandpa. Now we'll have a strong guardian angel watching over us. Love you<3
